"I don't believe it," said Mum, emerging from the kitchen cupboard. "We're out of baked beans again. Jack, can you pop to the shop? There's a pound on the hall table." "Do I have to?" moaned Jack. "No," Mum replied. "I could boil some cabbage." "On my way," said Jack. The corner shop was three minutes away. Jack went to the shelf with the tins: tomatoes, peas, spaghetti hoops, but no beans. "Do you have any baked beans in stock?" he asked. "Sorry, dear, we ran out this afternoon. Delivery comes tomorrow." Jack wandered out, thinking. He could go to the convenience store, but what if they were out of beans too? What if everywhere was out of beans? He visualised supermarkets with empty shelves. "Who's got them all?" he whispered. He imagined a millionaire surrounded by tins, laughing wickedly as he sat in a bath of beans.
